

Benjamin Grant Purzycki

In addition to the costs, timing, and frequency of ritual, many posit that social and environmental pressures can change the content of religious beliefs. However, little experimental work has assessed the causal role between socioecological pressure and what people claim about their deities. Using four experimental conditions, this project assesses this causal pathway by examining whether or not the content of freely elicited beliefs about God's concerns co-vary with returns in a Trust Game